There is a real majesty in children playing together. As if the human essence becomes denuded of all the pretenses it’s built up around itself over the past hundred thousand years, and all its inborn joys, fears, hatreds, ecstasies are revealed in their purest and simplest expression. Laid bare.

There are times in this silent city when I weep at how long it’s been since I’ve seen children play.

*